Hi

We're planning on launching at the end August.

On Wednesday, Southern Cross University with Coffs Harbour City Council and our local newsaper the Coffs Coast Advocate, will host the first of three forums on Where we are, Where we Want to Be and How Will We know When We Get There.

For any community MAP will be an invaluable tool to measure like with like. This initiative is timely and well appreciated.

Hi all - Thanks for your interest. I just want to say that although we haven't launched the blog yet, we have still been busy in our consultation so far - talking to data users in all the capital cities, experts, etc - But looking forward to connecting with the blogosphere and other public soon.

Really? When housing unaffordibility is so high? When was it the objective of an advanced society to make the cost of living higher for the following generations?

Hi Donato. Thanks for the link. As much as I wish, I can't read Italian, however from doing a 'dodgy' electronic translation, your post seems very interesting and highlights one of the important debates in this field - whether to use composite indices vs a suite of indicators. The ABS has chosen to use a suite of indicators in MAP. You can read more on why the ABS has chosen this approach on

What approach did the ABS take in presenting progress data

Yes, I agree with all of the above. My main concern is sustainability and preserving the environment

Its depressing to listen to the talk up fest on the abc without a decent reference to population. There really is a conspiracy, that has been alluded to by others, within media organisations. How can we regard it as progress when wealth is generated by continual population growth. Go to any pub at 5.00pm to see the fluro shirted tradies feeling good about themselves with all the work. If more people cant be grown here or imported then we have bigger houses to fuel economic growth.Ausralia doesnt exist in a vacuum and with 9+ billion projected for the world there has to be international action. The Michael Stuchbury s might remind us how wealthy we are but I believe we cannot be truly happy until there is balance. Developers talk about balance too but it is one about a fulcrum shifting their way with continual population growth. It must "overbalance" one day. As Arthur C Clark puts it "we as a creature at the the top of the food chain we should be rare". Lets face it, rabbits think more rabbits is progress. I think progress should be measured by enobling of the human species, to be a balanced part of planet.

I think the progress that is being made where people who have been victims of sexual abuse are more able to speak out and be respected and responded to. This was not the case not so long ago. I think we need an National Index of Destructive Secrets. The ABS could just ask people anonymously whether or not they would say that they carry one or more secrets that are in fact harmful by being kept.
